Glenallachie Distillery

The Glenallachie distillery situated in the Speyside village of Aberlour did not have an auspicious start in life. Founded in 1967 it fell victim to the terrible 1980s distillery closure epidemic and despite being bought by Invergordon Distillers in 1985 it was promptly mothballed. Thankfully, this hiatus proved short-lived and new ownership fired up the stills in 1989.

Glenallachie is a rarity among its Speyside brethren in that it makes use of a lightly peated malt, giving its spirit a slightly roasty, earthy edge most evident in younger age statements but which integrates with time into a rich, dry and infinitely moreish whisky given time.

Once upon a time it was extremely rare to find as a single malt, given the distillery was custom built to produce blended whisky and even today single cask bottlings are a thrilling rarity. A whisky that performs very well at an advanced age and takes to sherry wood and other wine cask finishes very well, this is a good canvas for someone who wants to bottle their whisky and put their own stamp on it.

Glenallachie – Cask Tasting Note

Glenallachie's delicately peated profile comes through quite prettily here and I am very impressed with the youthful barley-driven vibrancy that it this cask shows after 12+ years. There are elements of maturity but in my view they are merely indicators of where this cask is going in the years ahead. The colour is remarkably pale but I would still advise against putting it into sherry wood, even if just for the colour as the malt is the main event here and it is showing very promising things even at this stage. 20+years is looking very doable indeed for this cask. George Stewart, Cru Fine Wine Head Buyer.
